Does the Wandering Jew really still exist in flesh as well as spirit? For the sake of argument, why not say aye. If we return to the erueifixion, we behold Christ led by the Jewish shoemaker's house, bowed down beneath the weight of that very cross which the manifold guilt of the race he loved too well had condemned him to bear. Centuries have elapsed since these cities have crumbled into ashes and been replaced by new ones. Jerusalem was razed to the ground, and the weary pilgrim has stood again upon its site and discovered no familiar landmark of the past. The wife of his bosom, the child of their love, all have long since returned to dust. He, and he alone, survives the ruin and the desolation of time. Often a terrible fear possesses his soul-the fear that ages of remorse and penitence may not atone for the sin of his ignorance, and that wife, child and other beloved ones are lest to him forevermore.

- And yet he has faith, and is very tient. Well practiced in all sorrows, the one great woe of sacrilege appears to have swallowed up and absorbed all minor afflictions. May we not suggest, however, that sometime hence he will probably be brought forward before the atheists and anti-christs as the visible and tangible evidence of Christ's death and existence and imperisable proof of his living power.

There are obdurate hearts among the multitude and satirical skeptics whom Feet, etc., etc. nothing less than so great a mirical could convince or redeem. God wills that not even one shall be lost.
